

Davinia Hamilton

For Gallantry (1942)

self-translated from Maltese by the poet

from the field you'd have seen it / the plane nosing the clouds / flashing silver / a bright smile / shattering the torpor of the morning / the siren didn't sound / i read the reports later / it was an attack with no warning / it was an ordinary morning in għajnsielem / ġużeppi, my grandfather, aged 12, closed his eyes again, resisting the day / lulled by the music of breakfast / the kettle skirled / the teaspoon jangled / soon his mother would be backlit in the door frame, corpulent and loud, always smelling of flour with an apron stretched over the bowl of her belly, sucking her teeth / sar il-hin / already a pie cooling on the wire tray / for now, she buttered bread and sprinkled sugar into tea cups / the steel bird gave a languid purr / the missile whistled / his mother looked up / from the field you'd have seen it / quick / inside /

/ the moment exploded before the bomb did / the children momentarily / animal foreknowing / hairs stood on end / then came the blast / then came the fire / the world a blazing red / five of them dead / ġużeppi displaced / alive in the ruins / everything changes / in the blink of an eye / before the milk can be stirred in / the family leaves the village / his father can no longer bear / the cedar trees / the smell of a fresh catch / moves them to the city / goes to bed early / the children pretend they cannot hear when he sobs late into the night / george / the king / gives us a cross bearing his name / for gallantry / ġużeppi has to look up the word / to the island fortress of malta / the most bombed place on earth / to bear witness / there are children begging for scraps in the streets / to a heroism and devotion / fifteen thousand tonnes of death /we will endure / the governor says / pins the cross to the flag / in english.
